

Telemarketing has become such a scourge to the consumer landscape these days. Attorney General Steve Carter (IND) has taken a courageous stand against frivolous telemarketers here in Indiana and pioneered legislation that stops Telemarketers in their tracks. Now the Consumer Bankers Association is seeking to weaken current legislation here in Indiana so that previous customers (or current ones) can be subject to telephone harassment in the form of "marketing". This is nothing but an attempt to make an end-run around existing law. If the Bankers are allowed to succeed, then who is next? Doesn't an individual's privacy count for anything these days? I am so tired of various corporate entities deciding they have a right to stick their nose into my personal affairs.
